G. Ebers (Durch Gosen zum Sinai), gives plausible reasons for believing that the Ancient Egyptian mannu denoted the exudation of Tamarix gallica. 'As the Arab. mann has the same sense, it seems possible that the Heb. word may represent the name anciently current in the Sinaitic wilderness for this natural product, which in many respects agrees with the description of the miraculous manna, and which is still locally regarded as a dew falling from the sky.'

The etymological tradition or conjecture preserved in Ex. xvi. 15 represents the word as having originated from the question man lū? 'what is it?' (in Aramaic or supposed archaic Heb.), which grammatically admits of being interpreted 'It is man'. (Of the Vulgate, l. c.: Dixerunt ad inuicem: Manhu, quod interpretatur, 'quid est hoc?')

The word has been adopted in most versions of the Bible, and appears in figurative uses in the literature of most of the countries of Christendom. Cf. Goth., OHG. (MHG. mod.G.), Du., Sw. it. manna, F. manne, Sp. maná, Pg. maná.

Whether the Gr. μάννα, L. manna, fem., meaning a grain of frankincense (sense 9 below), is connected with this word is uncertain, though an oriental origin for it is probable.]

3. A unit of English territorial organization, originally of the nature of a feudal lordship.

The doctrine of the lawyers of the 17th c. is that a manor consists essentially of land held in demesne by the lord, to which is attached a seignory over freehold tenants sufficient in number (the minimum is variously stated as two or three) to constitute the court, called at a relatively late time the court-baron, which the lord is bound to hold and the tenants to attend. (The manor was often defined from the point of view of its relation to the lord, as an estate in land consisting of demesnes and services.) This restriction of the meaning of the word is destitute of early authority (though the kind of complex estate described probably existed from the 12th century), but is the basis of the present application. As the status of tenant in fee under a mesne lord is practically obsolete, a manor now consists of the lord's demesne (if any exists) and of lands from the holders of which he has the right to exact certain fees and fines, and whitho which he has certain privileges. A 'court customary' is held in all manors where there are copyhold or customary tenants of the demesne. A manor is usually named from the principal township, as 'the manor of Barnstable'.

b. With qualifications. Assessionable manor, one of the manors into which the duchy of Cornwall is divided, to which commissioners are appointed periodically for the purpose of assessing them, or letting them on the best terms; customary manor (see quot.); reputed manor, manor by reputation, a manor which has lost its manorial status by expiry of some necessary adjunct; manor in ancient demesne, a manor which at the time of the Conquest formed part of the royal domain; manor in gross, a manor from which the demesne has been separated, leaving only the incorporeal hereditaments to the lord.

1607 COWEL *Interpr. s.v. d. In some of the American colonies, authority was given by royal charter for the creation of 'manors' after the English model, with courts-baron and seigniorial rights. The Dutch governors of what is now the State of New York also granted 'manors', with certain hereditary privileges now abolished. (See quot. 1870 and PATROON 4.) The term still continues to be applied to certain districts in the U. S. which were 'manors' in colonial times.

2. Law. A species of criminal homicide of a lower degree of criminality than murder; now defined as criminal homicide without malice aforethought.

In etymological meaning there is no difference between manslaughter and homicide (L. homicidium, F. homicide, both used in early Eng. law-books). In its modern technical use, manslaughter corresponds generally to the 'simple homicide' of early Law French and Law Latin writers, which was used in contradistinction to 'murder' (though the distinction is not identical with the modern one), and ordinarily implied criminality.

According to the modern interpretation, manslaughter is committed when one person causes the death of another either intentionally in the heat of passion under certain kinds of provocation, or unintentionally by culpable negligence or as a consequence of some unlawful act.

In Scotland the term corresponding to manslaughter is 'culpable homicide'.

(2) In the 12th c. the word was taken up again in the OFr. form mantel (mod.F. manteau: see MANTEAU); cf. Pr. mantel cloak, It. mantello cloak. A special group of senses taken from the Fr. is now distinguished by the spelling MANTLE.

According to most philologists, the L. mantellum cloak is more correctly written mantellum, and is etymologically identical with mantellum, mantellum, mantellum, mantellum table-cloth, towel. (Cf. Sp. mantel pl., table-linen; also MANTEAU.) On this supposition, the word must have been mistaken for a dim., and so have given rise by back-formation to the late L. mantum (7th c.), mantia, whence Sp., Pg., It. mantó, mantia, Fr. mantle, and the diminutives Sp. mantilla (see MANTILLA), Pg. mantilla, It. mantiglia.)

1. A loose sleeveless cloak of varying length.

The name was applied indifferently to the outer covering of men, women, and children, and at times acquired a specific application to one garment or another. Now its use is restricted to a cloak of silk or fine cloth worn by ladies; to the robe of state worn by kings, princes, and other persons of exalted and defined station; and to an infant's outer robe.

1. quasi-sb. On the analogy of a few (see FEW 2), a has from the 16th c. been prefixed to many when followed by a pl. sb. or used absol. in plural sense. In such collocations many formally admits of being interpreted as a sb., meaning 'a great number'. This interpretation is somewhat strained when a many is immediately followed by a pl. sh., because the ellipsis of of, which must be assumed, is abnormal; but in the other cases it presents no difficulty, and it would often be impossible to determine whether in the consciousness of the speaker the word is an adj. used absol. in pl., or a genuine sh. Confusion with MEINIE, of which there are many traces in the 16th c., seems to have contributed to cause the word in this use to be apprehended as a sh. Often with prefixed adj. as in a †considerable, good, great, †pretty, †jolly many; also †no small many.

a. with pl. sb. (or people) immediately following. In this use a many hardly differs in sense from many, and is now somewhat rare in literary use, though a good many, a great many, are common colloquially.

L. marcasita (whence F. marcassite, Sp. marquesita, It. marcassita, marchesita), app. formed with suffix L. -ita, Gr. -itis, -ITE.]

The etymology is obscure, as the Arabic marqashithā or marqashith, often cited as the source, is probably adopted from some European language.

1. Pyrites, esp. the crystallized forms of iron pyrites used in the 18th c. for ornaments; by some restricted to the arsenical varieties of pyrites; in recent use, white iron pyrites (iron disulphide).

For the vague notion attached to the word in pre-scientific chemistry, see quots. 1616 and 1727-52. The 'marcasites' of gold and silver seem to have been specimens of copper and iron pyrites with the lustre of gold and silver, and hence wrongly supposed to contain traces of those metals.

On this principle, there should be as many different marcasites as metals. . . Gr. μαργαρίτης (also μαργαρίτης or μαργαρίτης λίθος, and simply μαργαρίτης), f. μαργαρίν or pearl, μαργαρίν or pearl-oyster + -της: see -ITE. In the early Tent. langs. the word was adopted with etymologizing perversion: the Goth. markreitus (from the Greek), is influenced by marî, marci sea, while the WGER. forms, OE. nieregrot, -grotas, OS. merigri (olta), OHG. merigroz, marigroz, MHG. mergriez (e), are altered so as to express the sense 'sea-pebble'.

The word is prob. adopted from some oriental lang. (Pliny refers to it as 'barbarous': cf. Skt. marjari cluster of flowers, also (according to the Indian lexicographers) the Pahlavi mar-wārit pearl, cogn. w. mauiju beautiful). The Pahlavi mar-wārit (i.e. 'marry'), Pers. merwid, Arabic margarithā (whence Arab. marjān) are prob. from Greek.]

Mark (märk), sb. 1. Forms I mearc, Anglian mere, (also gemierce, gemerce, Northumb. meroe, merca), 2 marc, 3-5 merk(e, (Orm.
morrke), merck, k, marck(e, 4, 7 marque, 4-mark.
[OE. mearc, Anglian mere, str. fem., boundary, landmark, sign = OFris. merik(e), merke, boundary, sign, OS. marka boundary (MDu. marke, mod.Du.
mark), OHG. marca boundary (MHG., mod.G.
mark fem.), ON. mrk (known only in the derived sense 'forest'; Sw. Da. mark field, ground), Goth. marka boundary, landmark:—O.Teut. markd*.
A neuter form (:—O.Teut. type markdō*) exists in several Teut. langs. with the senses 'sign', 'landmark', 'standard', etc.: MDu. mark (mod.Du.
merk), MHG. mark (mod.G. has marke fem., prob. influenced by F. marque), ON., MSw. mark.
The ME. form merke (disyllable), while normally representing the OAnglian pronunciation mere, may in part descend from ONorthumb. niere (also written niere), token, sign, and in part also from an adoption of the equivalent ON. merki neut.,
landmark, standard, sign (Sw. märke, Da. merke):—
O.Teut. type markjō*, i. markd* (see above); it may also, in northern dialects, represent partly the ONorthumb. gemierce sign, token (= WS. gemierce, OHG. gimierchi boundary:—O.Teut. ga-markjō*),
as the prefix ge- of sbs. did not survive into ME., and the palatalized e in final syllables became i in northern Eng. According to phonetic law the ME. merke regularly became mark in mod.Eng.,
thus coinciding with the descendant of WS. mearc.

The Teut. word and its derivative vb. were early adopted into Romanic; the sb. appears as OF.
mere, mare masc., F. marque fem., mark, sign, etc.,
marche (ONF. marque) boundary (see MARCH sb.3), Pr., Sp., Pg., It. marca mark, sign, boundary.
Some of the senses developed in F. marque have coloured the application of the Eng. word.

The O.Teut. markd* appears to be cogn. w. L. margo MARGO, Oceltic marog*, country (Gaulish brogi in place-names, Welsh bro, Irish brúig, brúig, Persian marz boundary. The extra-Teut. relations confirm the view which is suggested by the evidence of Teut. itself, that the primitive sense is 'boundary'. The order of development of senses which appears most probable, and is assumed as the basis of the arrangement below, is 'boundary', 'sign of a boundary', 'sign in general', 'impression, trace or device used as a sign', 'impression, trace, etc. in general'. Some scholars, however, have considered the sense 'visible trace' as primitive (comparing Lith. margas part-coloured), and have supposed the sense 'boundary' to be either derived from this or to belong to an independent word.

2. Hist. The name applied in mediæval Germany to the tract of land held in common by a village community. Hence used by many modern scholars to denote the tract of land similarly held by one of the village communities of primitive Teutonic times.
Also attrib., as in mark-community, family,
-system; markmoot (pseudo-arch.), a (supposed)
assembly of the inhabitants of the 'mark'.

Kemble's fancy that OE. mearc was the name of a unit of territorial organization next below the shire (scir or gsh) has no foundation. The alleged OE. mearemdot* 'mark-moot', has no existence: the mearemdot occurring in a schedule of boundaries of land at Barrow-on-Humber in 971 (Birch C. S.
No. 1270) may perh. mean 'parsley-bed', and in any case does not admit of Kemble's interpretation.

1848 KEMBLE Saxons in Eng. (1876) i. iii. 76 As then the word Mark is used to denote two distinct things—a territorial division and a corporate body—so does the word Gá or Scir denote both [etc.]. 1867 FREEMAN Norm. Cong.

sented by the modern parish or manor. 1874 STRASS Const.

not as a member of the mark-community, that the freeman has rights. 1876 DUGBY Real Prop. i. § 1. 5 Each community occupied a territory or mark, which was divided into three, or rather four portions. 1887 Edin. Rev. Jan. 10 In the manor and the mark.

an exclamatory phrase, prob. originally serving as a formula to avert an evil omen (cf. quot. 1833) and hence used by way of apology when something horrible, disgusting, indecent or profane has been mentioned. In mod. literary use (after some of the examples in Shaks.), an expression of impatient scorn appended to a quoted expression or to a statement of fact.

(It has been affirmed (see W. A. Henderson in N. & Q. 8th ser. vii. 37) that the phrase was used by midwives at the birth of a child bearing a 'mark'. This may possibly be its original use: cf. quot. a 1625 below. The meaning of 'mark' in the expression may, however, have been 'sign' or 'omen' (see 11). There is no foundation for the statement copied in recent Dicts. from Dr. Brewer, that the phrase was originally used by archers.)

Mark (mārk), sb. 2 Forms: 1-5 (also from Fr. 8-9) marc; 4-7 marke, 5 marcke, 5-6 Sr. merke, 5-9 Sc. mark, 3- mark. [Found in all the Teut. and Rom. langs.; Late OE. marc neut. L. marca (9th century), marcus (12th c.), F. marc masc. (11th c.), Pr. marc masc., Sp., Pg., It. marco masc., It. marca fem.]

The form of the OE. word (with a 'not broken' before re) shows that it is not a native word. Some scholars have supposed it to be from ON., but the geometer perhaps points rather to popular Latin as the source. The proximate origin appears to be Rumanian; whether the word is ultimately Teutonic (connected with Mark sb. 4) is doubtful.

The origin of the Fr. word is obscure; it has been conjectured to be a derivative of L. marmor marble, but the form is not easy to account for. It can hardly be unconnected with F. marmot little child (whence prob. It. marmocchio), in early use also 'monkey', 'grotesque statuette'; forms app. cognate are med. L. marmosinus, marmosinus (Promp. Farv.), marmosinus monkey. 4 marchis, 6 marches; 4-5 markis, markys, 5 markesse, markoes, markois, 5-6 markyse, markes, 6 markas, marcas, -cus, marks; 5 marquos, marquys, 5-6 marques, 5-7 merques, 6-7 marquesse, 6- marquess; 5 marquis, 6 marquisse, marquise, 6-9 marquiss, 7- marquis. [a. OF. marchis, later altered to marquis (whence Da. markies); corresponding to Pr. marques, -is, Sp. marqués, Pg. marquês, It. marchese; f. Com. Rom. marca (see MARK sb. 3, MARK sb. 1) frontier, frontier territory + -ese: -L. -ēnsis suffix forming adjs. from place-names (see -ESE). The word is thus etymologically an adj. the sb. understood being that represented in Eng. by COUNT, so that the title was equivalent to MARGRAVE. The med. L. representative was marchionem (marchio), still preserved in heraldic Latin: cf. marchioness. The prevailing spelling in literary use appears to be marquis. Some newspapers, however, use marquess, and several English nobles bearing the title always write it in this way.]

1. In various European countries, the title of the ruler of certain territories (originally 'marches' or frontier districts). This gradually passed, in Romanic-speaking countries, into a mere title indicating a certain grade of noble rank, immediately below that of duke and above that of count. In English it is commonly used to designate a person of this titular rank in the modern nobility of foreign countries (though the foreign forms, It. marchese, Sp. marqués, etc. are sometimes retained), and also Hist. as the appellation of those territorial lords to whom it was applied in earlier times. Formerly it was often employed (now rarely) as the English equivalent of MARGRAVE.

2. At the end of the 14th c. the title was introduced into England to designate a specific degree of the peerage, between those of dnke and earl. Late in the 15th c. this degree was adopted in the peerage of Scotland. The title still continues, indicating the same relative rank, in the peerage of the United Kingdom and in those of Scotland and Ireland. When a duke is also a marquis, his second title is given 'by courtesy' to his eldest son: thus the eldest son of the Duke of Devonshire is called 'the Marquis of Hartington'.

The title of a marquis is usually territorial in form, as 'the Marquis of Salisbury', but in some instances 'Marquis' is prefixed to a surname, as 'the Marquis Cornwallis'. 1399 Rolls of Parlt. III. 452/1 The Dukes. . . and the markys here present. 1445 Ibid. V. 394 William de la Pole, than Marquys and Erle of Suffolk. 1452 Ibid. 226/1 The Name or Estate of Duke, Marquys or Erle. 1473 *WARKW. + 3. In the 16-17th c. often employed as a female title, equivalent to the later MARCHIONESS. Obs.

It is not easy to see how far this was regarded as an application of the masculine title, and how far it was taken as an anglicization of MARQUESS. The spelling marquess was commonly preferred in this use, prob. through association with the suffix -ess. Lady was often prefixed.

The tower was of a type common in the Mediterranean; the stout resistance which it was able to make with a small force led to a belief among English military experts that the construction had great defensive value, and the erection of 'martello' towers was therefore strongly urged on the British government, but it was not until 1804 that any were actually erected. Windham's account of the events of 1793-4 is grossly inaccurate, but there appears to be no room for doubt that he refers to these.]

3. Martial law. a. That kind of military government of a country or district, by which the ordinary law is suspended, and the military authorities are empowered to arrest all suspected persons at their discretion, and to punish offenders without formal trial. † b. Formerly sometimes applied to what is now called 'military law', viz. the body of enactments and rules for the government of the army; an enactment or rule forming part of this.

Originally these two senses (in which the adj. has respectively senses 1 and 2) would not always be distinguishable, as military law existed only in war time, and consisted mainly of temporary and occasional ordinances; our earliest quotes, however, distinctly exhibit the same use as is now current. In early examples the adj. is often assimilated in spelling to MARSHAL sb., and it was a common opinion that 'marsh law' was so called as being the law emanating from the lord marshal. Mod. Fr. has loi martiale, but perh. from English.

Martin¹ (mā'tin). Also 5 martoune, 6, 9 marten, 7 martyn. [Presumably a use of Martin (a. F. Martin, ad. L. Martinus), a male Christian name common in Western Europe after St. Martin bishop of Tours (4th c.), whose festival is 11th Nov. (MARTINMAS). The name is applied in Fr. to various birds, as in martin-chasseur, the hen-harrier, martin-pêcheur, the kingfisher; the dim. martinet (see MARTINET) denotes the house-martin and the swift.

The application of the Christian name to birds has no obvious reason, and may have been purely arbitrary. Many writers of the 17th c. say that the martin is so called because it comes in March and departs about Martinmas.]

This is commonly supposed to mean literally 'hose after the fashion of Martigues' (in Provence), and the 'martingale' for a horse is assumed to have been so named from its similarity to hose of this kind. 2. Her. An imaginary bird without feet, borne as a charge. Used as a mark of cadency for a fourth son.

In French heraldry the corresponding bird (described as having neither feet nor beak) is called merlette (OF. merlette, meslette; AF. heraldry had merlot, merlot, with differing dim. suffix). This word is app. a dim. of merle blackbird; according to Littré it has the sense 'female blackbird', but only the heraldic sense appears in Hatz-Darm. It seems possible that the heraldic bird may originally have been intended for a 'little blackbird', represented without feet by accident or caprice, or with symbolical intention, and that the English heralds of the 16th c. or earlier identified the bird so depicted with the 'martlet' or swift, which has short legs, whence its mod. specific name apus = Gr. ἄπυς footless. It is noteworthy that the 'martlet' (so called in the 16th c.) in the pretended arms of Edward the Confessor were at an early period portrayed with feet. The anglicized form of merlette, MARLEY, does not occur in heraldic use, but appears in several 16th c. instances with the sense of martlet, i.e. a swift or a martin. According to English heraldic writers, the use of the footless bird as a mark of cadency for younger sons was meant to symbolize their position as having no footing in the ancestral lands.

The Gr. word was adopted in Goth. as martyr. The Lat. word passed into all the Rom. langs. (OF. martir, Pr. mod.F. Fr., martyr, Sp. martir, It. martire) and some of the Teut. langs. 1. Eccl. The specific designation of honour (connoting the highest degree of sainthood) for: One who voluntarily undergoes the penalty of death for refusing to renounce the Christian faith or any article of it, for perseverance in any Christian virtue, or for obedience to any law or command of the Church.

A sect which regarded its distinctive principles as part of the Christian faith could apply the title, in this strict sense, to its own members who died under persecution, while by others the application would be repudiated, or only conceded ironically. Popularly, however, this sense has long tended to be apprehended as a specific use of sense 2.

Mask (mask), sb.3 Forms: (6) measque, 6-7 maske, 6-9 masque, 7- mask. [a. F. masque masc. (in 16th c. also fem.) of disputed origin, whence also G., Du. maske fem., Da. maske com., Sw. mask fem. MASQUE sb. was orig. a sense of the same word, now differentiated in spelling.]

The Fr. word (first recorded in 16th c.) is usually believed to be ad. the synonymous Sp. mascara, It. maschera (see MASKER sb., MASQUERADE). But it is difficult to believe that the word has no connexion with med.L. masca, masca, which render OE. grima mask, spectre; in the Corpus Glossary 725. Mascha is used c 685 by Aldhelm in association with larva, which had the senses 'mask' and 'spectre', and masca occurs in the Lombard Laws c 800 with the sense 'witch'; cf. Pr. masco witch; see MASCOT. On the whole the most plausible view seems to be that the representative of med.L. masca, masca survived in some Fr. dialect, and was thence taken into literary use as an equivalent of the like-sounding Sp. mascara. The origin of med.L. masca, masca, is undetermined; some scholars think the original sense was 'mask', and that the word was from Teut. maskon*-net (see MESH sb.)]

Heb. מְסֹרֶת māsōrēth, a word occurring in Ezek. xx. 37, where (by those scholars who do not regard the text as corrupt) it is interpreted 'bond (of the covenant)', and referred to the root מָסַר to bind. In post-biblical Heb. the word became common in the sense of 'tradition', being apprehended as from the root מָסַר to deliver, hand down; on this view of its etymology the normal punctuation would be מְסֹרֶת māsōrēth, which many modern scholars have adopted, though without ancient authority. The mod. Heb. מְסֹרֶת māsōrēth (whence mod. Latin Masora, F. Massora, Massore, G. Masora, Eng. Masora, Masorah), is said to date only from the 16th c., and (with this vocalization) is an abnormal formation from the root מָסַר.] The body of traditional information relating to the text of the Hebrew Bible, compiled by Jewish scholars in the tenth and preceding centuries; the collection of critical notes in which this information is preserved. Mass (mæs), sb.¹ Forms: 1-3 messe (North-umb. measse), 1-7 messe, 2-7 messe, 3 (in comb.), 4-6 chiefly Sc. and north. mes, 4-6 Sc. and north., 7-9 (sense 6) mess, 4-7 mas, (4 misse, 5 mase, mese, 6 miss), 6- mass. [OE. mæsse (Kentish and Mercian messe) wk. fem., a. vulgar L. messa (whence F. messe, Pr., It. mesa; Sp. missa, Pg. missa, are from written Latin); —Ecl. L. missa. The Teut. forms, partly from vulgar Lat. and partly from written Latin, are: OFris., OS. missa (MDu. misse, messe, mod.Du. mis), MHG. misse, messe (mod.G. messe), ON. missa (Sw. missa, Da. messe).

It is now generally agreed that the L. missa is a verbal sb. (formed like repula, collecta, offensa) from L. mittere (pa. ppl. missus) to send, send away, dismiss. The earliest known examples of the word belong to the last quarter of the 4th century, occurring in the Epistles of St. Ambrose and the Itinerary of Silvia of Aquitania. In the early centuries it had the general sense of 'religious service', being applicable, e.g., to matins and vespers, though in an eminent sense it always denoted the Eucharist. In secular application it occurs, though rarely, in the 5th and 6th centuries with the sense 'dismissal'. The origin of the liturgical application has been much disputed. Isidore (a 636) conjectured that the original reference was to the dismissal of the catechumens which was the preliminary to the eucharistic service. This explanation is not favoured by modern scholars, who consider that the wider sense 'religious service' is more likely than the narrower sense 'to have been the original. Some think that missa at first denoted the solemn dimissory formula at the conclusion of the service, ite, missa est, and hence came to be applied to the service itself. Others (as Kattenbusch in Herzog's Encycl.) have suggested, on confessedly slender and doubtful evidence, that missa in secular use had some such sense as 'commisio', 'official duty', and was therefore adopted as the rendering of Gr. λειτουργία (see Liturgy), which had primarily a similar meaning, but in ecclesiastical language was used for 'religious service' and specifically for the Eucharist. Several other theories have been proposed, but none of them has gained wide acceptance among scholars.]

1. The Eucharistic service; in post-Reformation use, chiefly that of the Roman Catholic Church.

In the 16th c. the Protestants generally objected to the term as being unscriptural, and as associated with the 'popish' view of the nature of the sacrament. (In Sweden and Denmark, however, the equivalent words are applied to the Lutheran communion service.) In the first Prayer-book of Edward VI (1549-9) the heading of the service reads 'The Holy Communion, commonly called the Masse', but in the subsequent Prayer-books the word was not used. In recent years some of the Anglican clergy have applied the term to their own rite.

20. Used vocatively as a term of respect or politeness. a. sing. = Sir. Now only in uneducated use. b. pl. (in later times always my masters) = Sirs, gentlemen. Now arch. or rhetorical, chiefly in ironical or derisive context.

21. A title prefixed to the name or designation of a man. Originally used only in speaking of or to a man either of high social rank or of learning (sometimes, esp. in Scotland, applied spec. to a Master of Arts), but gradually extended in application. In ordinary use now only dial., but in literature sometimes arch. or hist.; otherwise superseded by MR. (pronounced mī'stā).

The obscured pronunciation resulting from proclitic use doubtless began while the written form master was still commonly employed. Before the end of the 17th c. the abbreviation Mr. (originally only one among many others used for the word in all applications) had come to be restricted to the use in which the pronunciation was obscured, and to be the only permitted mode of writing the word in that use. Thenceforward master and Mr. were practically two words, distinct both in function and in form. In this Dictionary the abbreviation Mr., in all its historical varieties of use, will be treated in its alphabetical place.

a. Prefixed to a surname or a Christian name. Down to the 16th c. or a little later, master could be prefixed to the name of a knight or a bishop; at an earlier period it was freely used with the names of personages of ancient history and ancient writers. Some modern dialects have only one form for Master and Mr. as prefixed titles; others have both prefixes with a difference of function, Mr. being the superior title. (See E. D.)

F. mastic masc. (from 13th c.), ad. late L. masticum (also mastic), altered form of L. masticia, mastiche, masticē, a. Gr. μαστίκη. The etymology of Gr. μαστίκη is somewhat obscure. As mastic is in the East commonly used as 'a chewing gum', it is not improbable that the word is (as Apollodorus suggested) from the root of μασθάνω to chew; cf. μασθίξ jaw, μασθίξ (once, in Hesiod) to gnash the teeth; but the formation has not been explained.]

The form of the Eng. word is difficult to account for. Possibly the word was first known to Englishmen in the Pr. form masti-s; as this coincides with the form that would have been assumed in early OF. by the subject-case of a noun mastif*, the a forms may be due to grammatical interpretation, while the β and γ forms may have been taken directly from Pr. The word was more or less confused with OF. metif mongrel. The form MASTIN occurs only in Caxton's translations from Fr.: cf. MARIN.

Gr. had the neut. pl. τὰ μαθηματικά in the sense of mathematical objects, principles, facts, etc., as well as the fem. ἡ μαθηματική mathematical science, MATHEMATIC B. 1. The Gr. and Eng. use of the plural (known from the 16th c.) seems to have originated as an elliptic expression for 'mathematical sciences', and to have had at first no connexion with the Gr. use of the neuter plural. The analogy of names of sciences like physics, metaphysics (in which the pl. form is of Gr. origin) has, however, caused the sing. to be in English entirely superseded by the plural; in Fr., which has not the plural form in the other instances, the sing. mathématique survives in use as well as the plural.]

Originally, the collective name for geometry, arithmetic, and certain physical sciences (as astronomy and optics) involving geometrical reasoning. In modern use applied, (a) in a strict sense, to the abstract science which investigates deductively the conclusions implicit in the elementary conceptions of spatial and numerical relations, and which includes as its main divisions geometry, arithmetic, and algebra; and (b) in a wider sense, so as to include those branches of physical or other research which consist in the application of this abstract science to concrete data. When the word is used in its wider sense, the abstract science is distinguished as pure mathematics, and its concrete applications (e.g. in astronomy, various branches of physics, the theory of probabilities) as applied or mixed mathematics.

In early use always construed as a plural, and usually preceded by the. In recent use the is commonly omitted, and the sb. is almost always construed as a sing., exc. in (the) higher mathematics.

It has been conjectured that L. materia represents a prehistoric dmateria*, f. dmā* (cf. Doric Gr. dmā-dmā-dmā new-built) related to the Indo-germanic root dm-, dom- (occurring, e.g. in L. domus house and Eng. TIMBER). The primary sense continued to be prominent in late popular Latin: cf. Sp. maderia, Pg. madeira wood, and the derivative F. merrier timber-late L. mäteriamen (Lex Salica, etc.). The sense-development of the word in Latin was influenced by that of the Gr. dmā, of which it was the accepted equivalent in philosophical use. In the derived senses the Latin word has been adopted in all the Rom. langs.: Sp., Pg., It. materia, Roumanian materic.]

The ceremony of washing the feet of poor persons on the day before Good Friday was instituted in commemoration of Christ's washing the apostles' feet at the Last Supper, and of his injunction that his disciples should in like manner wash one another's feet (John xiii. 14). The words 'A new commandment (mandatum novum) give I unto you, that ye love one another' (Ibid. 34) from the discourse which followed the washing of the apostles' feet, were adopted as the first antiphon sung at the commemorative observance, which hence acquired the name of mandatum. (Hence OHG. mandit, in Otfried's paraphrase of John xiii. 11-14.) In later use, perh. owing to the currency of dis mandati (lit. 'day of the commandment') as a name for the day before Good Friday, mandatum frequently denoted the Last Supper itself.]

1. The ceremony of washing the feet of a number of poor people, performed by royal or other eminent persons, or ecclesiastics, on the Thursday before Easter, and commonly followed by the distribution of clothing, food, or money. Maxim (mæ'ksim), *sb.*¹ Also 5-7 maxime, 6 pl. erron. maximes. [a. F. maxime, ad. L. maxima fem. sing. of maximus greatest, used ellipt. (see below). Cf. Sp. máxima, Pg. maxima, It. massima.]

Boethius (6th c.) used propositio maxima ('greatest proposition') in the sense of 'axiom' (synonymous with dignitas = axioma, but especially used with reference to rhetoric). Albertus Magnus (13th c.) used maxima with ellipsis of propositio, but applied it to a class of universal propositions not intuitively certain like the dignitates or axioms, but capable of being assumed as practically indisputable. Elsewhere (according to Hamilton in Reid's Wks. 767, where the reference is incorrect) he identifies maxima and dignitas; and Petrus Hispanus and later logicians use maxima in the sense of 'axiom'.
